With the emergence of modern Hinduism in the 10th century, Diwali is now the most sacred time of the year for Hindus. It is celebrated by lighting oil lamps, burning sandalwood incense and offering prayers to Hindu deities. Details It is often celebrated by lighting oil lamps, burning sandalwood incense and offering prayers to Hindu deities. Diwali is the Festival of Lights that is based on the Hindu celebration of the return of light after a night of dark, and a day of enlightenment. It is the last day of the autumn harvest season in India. Diwali is often referred to as the Festival of Lights because it commemorates the worship of the Hindu Gods and the relief from the darkness of winter. It is celebrated throughout India, Nepal, and by many communities in other countries. This holiday is largely a harvest festival, a day when farmers celebrate the victory of good over evil. On the festival day, a chariot (from the Sanskrit word for a carriage or chariot) is pulled through the streets of India and Nepal, along with the traditional festive symbols of Diwali. Crowds of people gather around the chariot to watch the lamps lighting, accompanied by music and cries of fireworks. People dress up in colourful clothes and play musical instruments. On the streets, burning effigies of demons and the evil spirits of the dark are
