“This is definitely one of the most beautiful games that I’ve played” “The game that many people dreamt of is now available!” “A unique title that incorporates a serious story with a fantasy setting” “The most amazing online RPG that I’ve ever played” “It’s a game to be tried” Thanks for reading the review.Q: Using AJAX to POST a form, display the POSTED form I have a form, on a page. I want to submit it with AJAX, so that the form gets submitted (to an external service), then the result page is displayed. Is this something that should happen with AJAX or with PHP? All the examples I can find with AJAX are doing the opposite of what I want to do. A: The way that I've done this before is to use jQuery and AJAX to directly update the page that I want to update without leaving the page. If the data you want to send back with the update is within a form, then you can just bind submit as a handler for the form to capture that information in the submit. If the data is outside the form, you can use jQuery to append that information at the end of the document. Then you can update the content using the.load() method of jQuery. Let me know if that's not what you're looking for and I can give you more info. (I had never made such a button in my life) I purchased a bra from Nanja van Gelder at the Brisbane Premier of the Fantastic Mr Fox and she's pinching my idea of an old fashioned satin, high necked dress from the UK called 'Forme Rock With Wood and Lace'.
