Various hand-held dental instruments exist which are used by dentists for cleaning teeth and various parts of a patient's mouth. Such instruments include air-syringes which function to release high velocity streams of air or liquid to clean teeth and other parts of a patient's mouth. One of the disadvantages of using such instruments is that the high velocity of the stream of air or liquid traveling through the air or liquid passages of the instrument can cause injury to the patient and/or the dentists. This problem is exacerbated when the stream of air or liquid is directed toward a hard tooth surface in that the velocity of the stream will increase when the stream encounters a hard surface. Thus, dentists may inadvertently hit teeth with their instruments. To alleviate this problem, several dentists have used hand-held instruments that eject a stream of air or liquid at an angle relative to the instrument to avoid directing the stream directly at a patient's teeth. The shortcomings of such instruments include the fact that most of the stream of air or liquid is still directed at the surface of the teeth. Thus
